

My last 20 plus years of nursing have been in the field of cardiac nursing. I attended Emory University to learn about wound care to help my cardiac patients who had complications from healing after open heart surgery. I never imagined that I would be so intrigued with wound healing that I would leave my job of 15 years at Newark Beth Israel and transfer to the wound center at St Barnabas. I feel my cardiac history has been an asset in my new career. In the future, I would love to get involved in research and trial of new products. I look forward with continuing my education and taking the podiatry course in the near future.
